Cattle Breeding.

One of the most important subjects for the consideration of the practical farmer, and yet the one to the consideration of which he is generally most averse is that of the laws of reproduction, or the pirnciples of breeding, The theory rather than the fact, that like produces like is generally accepted, and acting upon that, the mass of farmers are content to use any decent looking bull, and some that are not quite decent looking, and to reserve for milking purposes the heifer calves of their best cows, no matter from what source they spring. They ignore the well established fact that the offspring of any animal is not simply the offspring of its own parents, but also of its grand-parents, and its great grand parents for countless generations back, and is just as likely to inherit their bad as their good qualities. terms the idea of tracing a pedigree, and they consider a herd book as chaff with which wily schemers inveigle young TRAINS CONNECT AS FOLLOWS:

That is to say, they breed alike throughout, from sire to son, mother to daughter, and so on down to indefinite generations. There is an unmistakable likeness prevailing among them. We have seen that our native cattle are made up of incongruities, in size, shape, color and quality. There is no uniformity of likeness among them. On the other hand, among the cross-breeds' progeny of the first generation, or half-breeds', some very choice ones will be found partaking largely of the qualities of the sire.

The unpracticed breeders may think that with so promising a calf, a bull may be raised that will answer his purposes and the qualities of his young stock from common cows, (from which the bull sprang,) will be good enough. and, therefore he uses him for breeding accordingly, and finds his progeny every way inferior, and wonders why it is so.
